

Hybrid sturgeon

Huso dauricus × Acipenser schrenckii (Aquaculture)

Hybrid sturgeon in our case refers to the Kaluga-Amur hybrid (Huso dauricus × Acipenser schrenckii), a commercially important aquaculture fish derived from two native sturgeons of the Amur River basin between China and Russia. Unlike classic wild sturgeon species, this is fundamentally a farmed product, developed for modern caviar and meat production and now firmly established in international luxury-food trade.

From a product perspective, the Kaluga-Amur hybrid is valued for its strong farming performance, high caviar yield, and good meat value, which together make it one of the most commercially efficient sturgeon types in the market. In China, sturgeon farming is not limited to caviar: large volumes are also sold as fresh fish for meat consumption, while only a smaller proportion of mature females is used for roe. Even so, Chinese cultured caviar has grown rapidly, and the most common caviar produced there is sourced from this hybrid.

By real commercial weight, China is overwhelmingly the key producing nation for this fish. Hybrid sturgeons account for around 80% of Chinese farmed sturgeon production, and Chinese caviar exports have become globally important since the mid-2000s. In practical market terms, the Kaluga-Amur hybrid is best understood as a modern industrial luxury species: not a traditional wild caviar fish, but one of the core aquaculture products behind today's premium farmed caviar supply.
